

Emirates Airline: A Billion-Dollar Sukuk-Bond Issue

Introduction

The Emirates Airline case discusses the mechanics of the billion-dollar Sukuk bond offering, which is applied to the global market. This financial decision was very strategic in enabling Emirates to achieve its expansion vision and mission while at the same time nominating 'Shariah-compliant financing structures'.

Key Challenges

This revealed itself as one of the more noteworthy potential pitfalls: The regulatory landscape varied greatly from region to region. This means that Emirates had the challenge to align the Sukuk structure to both the Islamic law and the international financial reporting standards.

Strategic Implications

Sukuk bond helped the Emirates to get the funding for acquiring more planes and developing the infrastructure of the airports it serves, all while still remaining as financially ethical as possible. It also supported the airline's continued influence of innovation and representation of cultural organization.

Conclusion

Sukuk bond helped the Emirates to get the funding for acquiring more planes and developing the infrastructure of the airports it serves, all while still remaining as financially ethical as possible. It also supported the airline's continued influence of innovation and representation of cultural organization.
